

Dear Readers,

We are extending the topic of 'Clinical Materia Medica' to the September month. The reason for doing same is, we received an overwhelming response to this topic and we would like to share more cases with readers which show the beautiful match of literature and clinical practice.

These cases included in this issue are a reflection of how a Materia Medica picture actually forms in front of the physician in a clinic. The pre-requisite for such situation to occur comes out clearly in the cases: good case taking and thorough knowledge of Materia Medica. The cases also emphasize the importance of knowing one's repertory, as to how correct rubrics are vital for reaching a correct remedy.

We are pleased to share a development which our journal is going through. "The Homeopathic Heritage" goes "PEER REVIEWED" from January 2013 onwards. This leap has come as a result of more than 12 months of research and thinking. The backbone of this step is certainly our long existence as a journal and our association with its readers and contributors. We have our in-house team of editors who review the articles and work on selection of articles and thereafter do editing from the content and language point of view. The Homeopathic Heritage already has a team of Editorial Board who contribute in selection of articles. Now, an independent team of researchers and experts have been formed who will review the articles and will give their opinion. The articles shall be sent to these reviewers as per the respective subject of the paper. The reviewers shall give their opinion on the quality of content, its relevance to the field and its appropriateness for the journal. The articles therefore shall be accepted and edited on that basis.

Initially, we will have only a small section of articles under "PEER REVIEWED" section. Since this is a time taking process we request the contributors to send their paper atleast 5-6 months in advance for consideration for publication. We would preferably take research based article in this section. We look forward to be your support and feedback as you have always provided.

We are announcing the topics till May 2013, so you can send in your paper well in time.
